ALUM, n. A²l'u³m. From alumen, perhaps akin to ἄλειμμα, an ointment. [B, 114.] Gr., στυπτηρία. Lat., alumen. Fr., alun. Ger., Alaun. It., allume. Sp., alumbre. A name given to a class of double sulphates, resembling each other in chemical structure and in crystalline form. (a) Originally it was applied to the double sulphate of aluminium and potassium, $Al_2(SO_4)_3.K_2SO_4+24H_2O$. This substance—known also as potassa-a., potash-a., or potassium-a., Lat., alumen [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Ger. Ph., Aust. Ph., Hung. Ph., Swiss Ph., Russ. Ph.], aluminii et potasii sulphas [U. S. Ph. (1870)], sulfas alumino-potassicus [Fr. Cod.], sulphas aluminico-kalicus [Dan. Ph., Norw. Ph., Swed. Ph., Finn. Ph.] (seu kalico-aluminicus [Netherl. Ph.]), Fr., alun de potasse [Fr. Cod.], Ger., Kali-Alaun [Ger. Ph.], It., solfato alluminico-potassico, Sp., sulfato aluminico-potásico [Sp. Ph.]—forms colorless octahedral or cubical crystals, of a sweetish astringent taste, moderately soluble in cold water, very soluble in boiling water, and insoluble in alcohol. Sp. gr., 1·724. The name is also commonly applied to the double sulphate of aluminium and ammonium, $Al_2(SO_4)_3.(NH_4)_2SO_4+24H_2O$. Also called ammonia-a. or ammonium-a. (Lat., alumen [Br. Ph. and U. S. Ph. (1870)], aluminii et ammonii sulphas. Fr., alun d'ammoniaque. Ger., Ammoniak-Alaun. It., solfato alluminico-ammonico. Sp., sulfato de alúmina y de amoniaco). A substance of almost identical properties with potassium-a., but distinguished by the evolution of ammoniacal gas when heated with caustic soda, potassa, or lime. Both varieties of a., when heated above 100° C., melt in their water of crystallization, and, if the heating is continued, the water of crystallization is dissipated and the a. swells up, forming a white opaque mass. See ALUMEN exsiccatum. Commercial a. (Alumen crudum [Greek Ph.], alumen venale seu crudum [Belg. Ph.], sulphas aluminico-kalicus crudus [Finn. Ph.]) often consists of a mixture of potassium and ammonium a's, and also usually contains a small proportion of sulphate of iron. A. is employed in medicine as an astringent, both locally and internally, as a remedy for lead poisoning and remittent fever, and as an emetic. (b) As a generic term, a. denotes any double sulphate of aluminium and a univalent element or radicle, of the general formula $Al_2(SO_4)_3.R'_2(SO_4)+24H_2O$, the specific name of such a's being formed by prefixing the name of the radicle R; e. g., silver-a., sodium-a. Such a's are isomorphous with potassium-a. If, however, the double atom R'_2 of the univalent radicle R' in the foregoing formula is replaced by R'', a single atom or molecule of a bivalent radicle, such as manganese or iron, the compound is no longer isomorphous with potassium-a., and is hence often called a pseudo-a. See Manganese-aluminium-a. (c) Basic a's are double salts formed by the union of basic aluminium sulphate with the sulphate of another metal. See Basic potassium-a. (d) By an extension of this nomenclature, the term a. is applied to a class of compounds formed from the a's described under (b) by the substitution of another metal for aluminium. In this way are formed: Iron-a's, of the general formula $Fe_2(SO_4)_3.R'_2SO_4+24H_2O$; manganese a's, of the formula $Mn_2(SO_4)_3.R'_2SO_4+24H_2O$; and chromium-a's, or chrome-a's, of the formula $Cr_2(SO_4)_3.R'_2SO_4+H_2O$. The special variety of a. is indicated by prefixing the name of the radicle R, unless this is potassium, when no prefix is used. Thus, chrome-a. is $Cr_2(SO_4)_3.K_2SO_4+24H_2O$, but the compound $Cr_2(SO_4)_3.(NH_4)_2SO_4+24H_2O$ is ammonium-chrome-a. (e) Another class of a's is formed by the combination of the selenates of aluminium, iron, chromium, and manganese with the sulphate of another element or radicle. Such compounds are called selenium-a's and have the composition $M_2(SeO_4)_3.R'_2SO_4+24H_2O$, where M is either iron, manganese, chromium, or aluminium, and R' is a univalent radicle. ALUMEN (Lat.), n. n. A^{2}l(a^{3}l)-u^2(u)′me^{2}n. Gen., alum′inis. Alum. 1. Among the ancients, an astringent substance, the true nature of which is not certainly known, some considering it to be alum, others thinking it to be ferrous sulphate. Its properties and appearance, as given by Pliny and Dioscorides, agree more closely with those of alum. 2. In the U. S. Ph., Ger. Ph., Austr. Ph., Hung. Ph., Swiss Ph., and Russ. Ph., potassium alum ; in the Br. Ph. of 1867 and the U. S. Ph. of 1870, ammonium alum ; and in the present Br. Ph. either ammonium or potassium alum. 3. Antimony ; "A., id est, antimonium" (Ruland). ALUMINA (Lat.), n. f. A^{2}l(a^{3}l)-u^2(u)′mi^{2}n-a^3. Fr., alumine. Ger., Thonerde. It., allumina. Sp., alúmina. Aluminium oxide, Al_2O_3, a substance isomorphous with the higher oxides of iron and chromium. A. occurs native, and very nearly pure, in the form of hexagonal prismatic crystals of corundum, varieties of which, distinguished chiefly by their color, are the sapphire, ruby, oriental topaz, oriental amethyst, oriental emerald, etc. A colorless variety is called hyaline corundum. Emery is an opaque variety containing oxide of iron. Crystallized a., both in the form of the ruby and in that of the sapphire, has been prepared artificially, and a. may also be obtained as a white powder or a hard amorphous mass. Next to the diamond, crystalline a. is the hardest substance known. Sp. gr., 3·5–3·9. A. acts as a weak base, and in the presence of stronger bases as an acid-forming oxide. See ALUMINATE. In the older chemical nomenclature of salts, the compounds of aluminium with oxy-acids were described as salts of a. ; e. g., aluminium sulphate was called sulphate of a. For these salts see ALUMINIUM. A. has been used in medicine as an absorbent and given in diarrhœa and dysentery in doses of 7 to 8 grains. ALUMINIUM (Lat.), n. n. A^{2}l(a^{3}l)-u^2(u)-mi^{2}n′i^2-u^{3}m(u^{4}m). From alum. Fr., aluminium. Ger., Aluminium. It., alluminio. Sp., aluminio. Syn.: aluminum, alumium. A metallic element first isolated by Wöhler in 1827. It occurs in nature in a great variety of minerals, usually combined with silica, either alone or in connection with iron, magnesium, calcium, and sodium. It also occurs native as an oxide. See ALUMINA. A. is a white metal, with a faint tinge of blue, capable of taking a fine polish. It is very malleable and ductile, its elasticity and tenacity being about equal to those of silver. It does not oxidize in the air, and resists the action of ordinary acids, except hydrochloric acid. Sp. gr. of cast a., 2·56 ; of wrought a., 2·67. It melts at 700° C., and, if allowed to solidify slowly, assumes a crystalline texture. It forms alloys with copper, silver, and mercury. In composition, it acts apparently as a triad, replacing 3 atoms of univalent elements ; but, in reality, it is probably a tetrad, its salts having the general constitution $R''' \equiv Al - Al \equiv R'''$, in which one of the 4 linking bonds of each a. atom serves to unite the latter to its neighbor. Ger., Aluminiumsulfat [Ger. Ph.], schwefelsaures A., schwefelsaure Thonerde. It., solfato d'alluminio. Sp., sulfato de aluminio. A compound of a. and sulphuric acid. 1. Normal a. sulphate, $Al_2(SO_4)_3 + 18H_2O$, the a. sulphate of the pharmacopœias (sulphate of alumina, concentrated alum), is formed by the action of sulphuric acid upon a. trihydrate, and also occurs native as a mineral. It forms six-sided tabular crystals of pearly lustre, having a sweet astringent taste, soluble in 2 parts (1·2 part, U. S. Ph.) of water, but nearly insoluble in alcohol. On heating, it melts in its water of crystallization, and, when the latter is given off, swells up, forming a porous mass, only slowly soluble in water. It has marked antiseptic and astringent properties, and is applied locally to foul ulcers, to the vagina in cases of offensive discharge, to the uterus, and, as a mild caustic, to vascular, polypoid, and other enlargements. 2. Basic a. sulphates, a. subsulphates, or compounds of a. sulphate and a. hydrate, are believed to be formed by partial precipitation by ammonia of a. sulphate in solution, and by boiling a solution of a. sulphate with freshly precipitated a. hydrate. Sp., trihidrato de aluminio (ó de alúmina). Syn.: argilla pura (seu hydrata), trihydrate of alumina. A substance, $Al_2(OH)_6 = Al_2O_3 + 3H_2O$, occurring native, and also prepared artificially by precipitating a soluble salt of a. (as alum) with ammonia or with sodium carbonate [U. S. Ph.]. As prepared by the latter process it is a light, amorphous powder, devoid of odor and taste, insoluble in water or in alcohol, but soluble in solutions of the acids and the alkalies. If dried at the ordinary temperature, it retains 2 molecules of water of crystallization, $Al_2(OH)_6 + 2H_2O$, and forms a hard, horn-like mass. A. trihydrate is a mild astringent and desiccant, and, when freshly precipitated, clarifies the liquid in which it is contained by withdrawing from it dissolved matter both organic and inorganic. If a. trihydrate is dissolved in a solution of a. chloride, and the resulting liquid is subjected to dialysis, a tasteless neutral solution of unstable colloidal hydrate of a. is formed. This soluble colloidal hydrate differs in properties from the colloidal alumina formed by decomposing a. acetate. See A. oxytetrahydrate. On heating to 300° C., a. trihydrate is converted into the oxydihydrate. Thomson's a. consists of a small gas-jet, A, and a second one, B, the latter sliding on a bar, D, the two jets being connected by a piece of rubber tubing, G, and supplied with gas through a thimble, H, which fits upon an ordinary gas-burner. The bar, D, is 30 cm. long, and is pivoted to the thimble in such a manner that the angle at which it is inclined is indicated on the graduated semicircular plate, E. The burner B can be slid upon the bar so as to be directly behind A or at any distance from it, the distance being shown by the scale marked on the bar (divided on one side into spaces of 2·5 cm., and on the other into English inches and half-inches. In determining the degree of ametropia, the jets are lighted and turned down to show small points of flame, about 5 mm. in diameter, and the patient, whose accommodation has been paralyzed with atropine, is placed at a distance of about 5 metres. An emmetrope should see each light clearly until one is placed directly behind the other—not as a diffused circle of light, as is the case with ametropes. The distance to which it is necessary to separate the lights for both to be seen clearly shows the degree of ametropia, each space of 2·5 cm. on the bar indicating an ametropia of 1 diopter. The form of ametropia is ascertained by placing a piece of red glass before the eye, so as to color one half of each circle, and noting on which side the colored half appears to be: if it is on the same side as the glass, there is myopia; if on the opposite side, hypermetropia. To detect astigmatism, the patient should be asked to observe if the flames, sufficiently separated not to coalesce, seem longer in one diameter than in another; if they do, the bar is to be raised or lowered until the two appear to be alike. The pointer, F, will indicate the angle at which they are placed, and the position of the meridian of greatest ametropia. [W. Thomson, "Trans. of the Am. Ophth. Soc.," 1878, p. 455 (F; L).]

AMIDE, n. A^{2}m'i^{2}d(id). For deriv., see AMMONIA and *-ide. Lat., amidum. Fr., amide. Ger., Amid. It., amide, ammide. Sp., amido. 1. A term formerly applied to amidogen. 2. A compound derived from ammonia by the substitution of an acid radicle for one or more atoms of hydrogen. Formerly the term included also such compounds when the replacing radicle was a metal or other base. (See ALKALAMIDE and AMINE.) The a's are classed as monamides, diamides, triamides, etc., according as they derive from 1, 2, 3, or more molecules of ammonia; they are further designated as primary, secondary, or tertiary a's, according as 1, 2, or 3 hydrogen atoms are replaced in each ammonia molecule. The primary a's (to which the name a. was formerly restricted) may be regarded as compounds of acid radicles with amidogen (NH_2), and as having the formulæ $R'.NH_2$ (monamides), $H_2N-R''-NH_2$ (diamides), and $H_2N-R'''\langle^{NH_2}_{NH_2}$ (triamides). The secondary a's (formerly called imides) have the formulæ $R''NH,HN=R''''=NH$, etc., in which R'' denotes either 2 univalent radicles or a single bivalent radicle. The term imide is usually restricted to the latter class of compounds. The tertiary a's (also called nitriles) have the formulæ $R'''N,N\equiv R^{vi}\equiv N$, etc. The a's may also be regarded as compounds in which amidogen or any other ammonia residue replaces hydrogen or hydroxyl. A compound having the general formula $R.C\{^{NR'}_{NR'_2}$ (in which R or R' represents a univalent radicle), imagined to be derived from a corresponding acid amide by the substitution of NR' for an atom of oxygen. AMMONIA (Lat.), n. f. A^{2}m(a^{3}m)-mo′ni^{2}-a^{3}. From sal ammoniacus, which, according to some, was so named from the temple of Jupiter Ammon in Lybia, near which it used to be prepared from camel's dung. Fr., ammoniaque. Ger., Ammoniak. It., ammoniaca. Sp., amoniaco. Syn. : ammoniacum, ammoniaca, alcali volatile, alkaline air. A colorless gas, NH_3, of an extremely pungent, suffocative odor, and of strong alkaline taste and reaction, having a sp. gr. of 0·5893. It has been obtained in a liquid and solid state by the action of cold and pressure. It is readily soluble in water and in alcohol, one volume of the former solvent taking up 700 volumes of a. at the ordinary temperature and pressure. (See Aqua ammoniæ, Aqueous a., and Spiritus ammoniæ.) In composition it is found widely diffused in nature, and the gas is formed artificially in a variety of ways, the primitive method having been to extract it from decomposing urine. Aqueous a. has been known since the time of Raymond Lully, in the thirteenth century, but Priestley first isolated the gas in 1774. The name a. was given to it by Bergman in 1782. In ordinary parlance, the word a. means a solution of a. in water (aqueous a.). In composition, a. acts as a monacid base, neutralizing acids and forming crystalline salts, known as ammoniacal or ammonium salts. Ph., Ger. Ph., Aust. Ph., Dan. Ph., Russ. Ph.], or of 20 parts by weight [Fr. Cod.], or of 17 parts [Belg. Ph.], in 100 parts of water. It is a clear, colorless liquid, of pungent irritating odor, acrid taste, and marked alkaline reaction, having a sp. gr. of 0·959 [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Ger. Ph.], or of 0·925 [Fr. Cod.]. In other pharmacopœias the percentage by weight of a. varies from 8 to 23, and the sp. gr. from 0·9160 to 0·966. Aqua ammoniæ, whether administered by inhalation of the ammoniacal fumes emitted from it, by the mouth, or by intravenous or hypodermic injection, acts as an energetic cardiac stimulant, and causes marked, although transitory, increase in the blood-pressure and rate of respiration. It is hence used in syncope and in depressed conditions of the system from any cause. It is also used internally as an antacid. Locally, it acts as a rubefacient, vesicant, or caustic, according to the degree of concentration of the preparation, and when taken internally, undiluted, acts as a corrosive poison. In very large doses it causes cardiac paralysis. [B, 5, 10, 113; L.]—Aqua ammoniæ acetatis. See Liquor AMMONII acetatis.—Aqua ammoniæ causticæ. Pure aqua ammoniæ. AMMONIACUM (Lat.), n. n. A^{2}m(a^{3}m)-mo-ni(ne)'a^{2}k(a^{3}k)-u^{3}m(u^{4}m). According to Dioscorides, the gum was so named from the temple of Jupiter Ammon in Libya, near which it was obtained. Cf. AMMONIA. Fr., ammoniaque, gomme ammoniaque (1st def.). Ger., Ammoniak, Ammoniakgummi (1st def.). It., ammoniaco (1st def.), ammoniaca (2d def.). Sp., amoniaco. 1. In the U. S. Ph., Br. Ph., Ger. Ph., Aust. Ph., Hung. Ph., Netherl. Ph., Swiss Ph., and Greek Ph., a gum-resinous exudation—the A. gummi [Belg. Ph.], gummi-resina a. [Dan. Ph., Fenn. Ph., Norweg. Ph., Swed. Ph., Russ. Ph.], gomme ammoniaque [Fr. Cod.], goma amoniaco [Sp. Ph.]—obtained, according to most authorities, from the Dorema a. (armeniacum) [Don], but, according to others, from species of Heracleum, Ferula, or other related genera. [See DOREMA a.] It occurs in the form of tears or of masses composed of the aggregated tears imbedded in a homogeneous mass (lump a.). The tears are rounded, varying in size from that of a small pea to that of a cherry, yellowish without, opaque and milky white within, compact and brittle, but softening easily with warmth. A. has a bitter, nauseous taste and a peculiar aromatic odor. It is only partially soluble in water, forming a white emulsion when triturated with the latter. It consists of gum, resin, bassorin, and a volatile oil in varying proportions It is used internally in doses of 10 to 30 grains in chronic bronchitis attended with excessive secretion, and externally as a counter-irritant. The a. of Dioscorides, Pliny, and Celsus was probably the same as the drug known by us under this name. See also GUMMI AMMONIACUM. 2. Ammonia (q. v. for many compounds). The emplastrum ammoniaci scilliticum [Swed. Ph.] and emplastrum ammoniaco-scilliticum [Finn. Ph.] are made in like manner with 1 part each of gum ammoniac and vinegar of squills. The Ger. Ph. orders purified gum ammoniac 30 parts, yellow wax 20 parts, purified galbanum 10 parts, purified pine-resin and common turpentine each 20 parts. The Swiss Ph. directs the same with the substitution of Venice turpentine for ordinary turpentine. The Belg. Ph. orders gum ammoniac 40 parts, and yellow wax, resin, and Venice turpentine each 20 parts. A similar preparation was official in several of the older formularies, either resembling the plaster of the U. S. Ph. and composed of a mixture of gum ammoniac and vinegar [Batav. Ph. AMMONIÆMIA (Lat.), n. f. A^{2}m(a^{3}m)-mo-ni^{2}-e'(a^{3}'e^{2}) mi^{2}-a^{3}. From ammonia, and αἷμα, blood. Fr., ammoniémie, intoxication ammoniacale. Ger., Ammoniämie. It., ammonioemia. A condition, consequent upon extravasation or retention of urine, in which the blood is supposed to be poisoned by ammonium carbonate set free by decomposition of the retained urea. Its chief symptoms are anorexia, nausea, and vomiting; a coated tongue, which in severe cases becomes dry and of a dark-red color; sometimes obstinate constipation, more usually diarrhœa with frequent and copious watery stools; a cold, clammy surface with normal or subnormal body temperature and small, frequent pulse; ammoniacal exhalations from the lungs and skin; and grave cerebral symptoms, soon terminating in fatal cases in coma. The affection is sometimes associated with uræmia, from which, however, it is totally different in pathology, and was thought by Frerichs to be the cause of puerperal eclampsia. [D; M.]

AMMONIUM (Lat.), n. n. A^{2}m(a^{3}m)-mo'ni^2-u^{3}m(u^{4}m). Fr., ammonium. Ger., Ammonium. It., ammonio. Sp., amonio. 1. A hypothetical univalent radicle, NH_4, supposed to be contained in ammoniacal salts. Compounds of ammonia with acids, which were formerly believed to be constituted by the direct union of the former and the latter, and to have, accordingly, the general formula $(NH_3)_nH_nR_N$ (where H_nR_N is a n-basic acid and R_N is an acid radicle of the quantivalence n), are now considered to be formed from the acid by the substitution of the radicle a. for the acid hydrogen, and to have consequently the general formula $(NH_4)_n.R_N$. From this point of view, ammoniacal salts are constructed precisely like the metallic salts, the radicle a. acting like a metal such as potassium. These salts are, in fact, isomorphous with those of potassium. It has even been thought that a. actually existed by itself in the metallic state, especially in the form of its amalgam with mercury; but this belief is now generally held to be erroneous. The same theory of constitution holds for the salts of the compound ammonias (amines and alkaloids). Thus, the so-called hydrochlorate of ethylamine, $NH_2(C_2H_5).HCl$, is also regarded as the chloride of ethylammonium, $NH_3(C_2H_5).Cl$. In abbreviated chemical nomenclature, a. is often denoted by the symbol Am. Molecular weight, 18; density, 9. [B.] 2. Ammonion (q. v.).—Acétate d'a. (Fr.). (1867)], spiritus (seu spiritus ophthalmicus, seu liquor) Mindereri. An extemporaneously prepared aqueous solution of a. acetate devised by Raymond Minderer, a physician of Augsburg (1570–1621). It was originally made by mixing strong vinegar and impure a. carbonate (spiritus cornu cervi), and contained besides the a. acetate an ammoniacal soap formed from the animal oil of the second ingredient. It is now made by neutralizing acetic acid, more or less diluted, with a. carbonate [U. S. Ph., Fr. Cod.], or with ammonia water [Ger. Ph.], or by diluting the stronger solution of a. acetate (liquor ammonii acetatis fortior [Br. Ph.], liquor ammonii acetici concentratus [Aust. Ph.]). It is a clear colorless liquid of a cooling, saline, sweetish taste, containing 7·6 per cent. [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph.], or 15 per cent. [Ger. Ph.], or 18·5 per cent. [Fr. Cod.] of a. acetate, and having a sp. gr. of 1·022 [U. S. Ph., Br. Ph.], 1·032–1·034 [Ger. Ph.], or 1·036 [Fr. Cod.]. It is much employed as a diaphoretic and stimulant, especially in acute catarrhs of the respiratory tract and in febrile conditions, also as a remedy in sick-headache and alcoholism, and externally is employed as a refrigerant and discutient application to bruises and swellings of various sorts. [B, 5, 81, 113, 205.]—Liquor ammonii acetatis fortior [Br. Ph.]. Stronger solution of a. acetate. A preparation, used for making the liquor ammonii acetatis, prepared by neutralizing 17¾ oz. Ph. of 1820, a similar preparation was made by distilling a. sesquicarbonate and potassium carbonate each 1 part with water 2 parts, and collecting the distillate. [A. Thomson (A, 5).]—Liquor amnii. Fr., liquide amniotique. Ger., Fruchtwasser. It., liquido amniotico. The liquid (commonly termed "the waters") which occupies that portion of the amniotic sac which is not taken up by the fœtus. Early in gestation it is clear and transparent, but it afterward becomes whitish like soapy water, greenish, or reddish, has a somewhat unpleasant odor, which has been compared to that of semen, and is slightly alkaline. It increases in quantity as gestation progresses. According to Robin, it contains epidermal cells, lanugo, portions of the vernix caseosa, cells from the fœtal kidneys and bladder, and a few leucocytes. Liégeois gives the following as its composition:

Water	975·00 to 991·00
Sodium and potassium chlorides	2·40 " 5·95
Calcium chloride	traces.
Sodium carbonate	traces.
Sodium and potassium sulphates	traces.
Calcium and magnesium phosphates and sulphates	0·14 to 1·72
Sodium lactate	2·00 " 3·50
Fat	0·13 " 1·25
Urea	traces.
Creatine, creatinine, and glucose	quantities not ascertained.
Albumin and mucosin	0·82 to 10·17

Prochownik considers that this fluid is exclusively of fœtal origin, being the product of the nutritive changes which take place in the fœtus, furnished by the skin and the kidneys. Other authorities have looked upon it as a product of the maternal organism, and still others as produced partly by the mother and partly by the fœtus. Its office is to protect the fœtus and the umbilical cord from pressure, and, when labor sets in, to bear the immediate action of the uterine efforts and dilate the cervix uteri. The body is either naked (Amœbinæ) or protected by a carapace (Arcellinæ). The pseudopodia may be projected from all parts of the body or from one point only. [B, 28.]

It., amputazione circolare. A method in which the soft parts are divided by a circular sweep of the knife completely around the limb, and in which, therefore, there are no separate flaps. There are two chief varieties of the method: 1. The first incision divides all the tissues down to the bone, and muscular action causes those on the proximal side to be drawn up; a second incision like the first, also reaching to the bone, is then made through the muscles at the level of the retracted skin; if necessary, a third incision is made in like manner. 2. The first incision extends only to the muscles; the second about half-way through them, and the third to the bone. In either case the bone is sawn through at the level of the uppermost cut in the soft parts, and the latter are then brought down so as to form the face of the stump.—Circular skin-flap a. One in which the skin is first divided by a circular incision and dissected back as far as the level at which the bone is to be divided, and the division of the soft parts completed by a circular cut at that level.—Coat-sleeve a. A modification of the circular a. in which the cutaneous covering for the stump is made very long, so as to be puckered together with a piece of tape encircling skin alone, instead of having its edges brought together with sutures. See Primary a.—Galvanocaustic a. Ger., galvanokaustische A. A method in which the soft parts are slowly divided with a galvanic-cautery loop, the bone being then sawn through. It has been practised a number of times in France and Germany with success, its alleged advantages being that it is attended with diminished shock, pain, and hæmorrhage, and its disadvantage that the healing process is prolonged. It is not always bloodless unless the main artery of the limb is compressed, and it has been followed by pyæmia, the prevention of which was one of its objects. [P. Bruns, "Arch. f. klin. [A, 393.]—Hey's a. A tarso-metatarsal a. differing from Lisfranc's in the fact that the internal cuneiform bone is sawn through in a line with the articulation of the second metatarsal, instead of being disarticulated. [A, 392.]—Humero-cubital a. Fr., a. huméro-cubitale. Ger., Abnahme des Vorderarms im Gelenke. A. at the elbow joint. Jour. of Med. Sci.," i, 1839 (E).]—Lappena' (Ger.). A flap a.—Larrey's a. An oval a. at the shoulder joint devised by Baron Larrey. An incision is made from the acromion to a point 2½ inches below, from which point an anterior and a posterior spiral incision are carried down the arm, meeting on its inner aspect. After the disarticulation of the bone, the flap is brought up and secured in the space made by the gaping of the first incision. [E, 2.] Cf. Spence's a.—Lee's a. A modification of Teale's a. in which the long flap is taken from the posterior aspect of the limb. [H. Lee, "Trans. of the Roy. Med. and Chir. On the right side, the direction of the transfixion is reversed. After disarticulation of the head of the bone, the inner flap is cut from within outward. [E, 2.]—Lister's a. A double rectangular flap a., in which the difference in the length of the flaps is not so great as in Teale's, but only sufficient to make the cicatrix come just beyond the edge of the bone. The angles of the flaps are somewhat rounded off, and the posterior one consists of skin and fascia only. In the thigh and leg, the long flap should equal in length one third of the circumference of the limb, and the other should be of half that length. [J. Ashhurst, Jr. (A, 277).]—Long and short rectangular flap a. Fr., a. à deux lambeaux rectangulaires inégaux. See Teale's a.—Major a. Fr., grande a. Ger., grössere A. An a. of the thigh, leg, arm, or forearm, or at the hip, shoulder, knee, or elbow joint.—Malgaigne's a. See A. en raquette and Subastragalar a.—Mediate a. Fr., a. médiate. See Intermediary a.—Medio-tarsal a. Lat., exarticulatio in medio tarsi. Fr., a. médio-tarsienne. It., amputazione medio-tarsica. 1.

The middle ring has a cutting edge directed toward its centre. The three shafts are so connected with a mechanism in the handle that, after the loop of the instrument (consisting of the three rings) has been passed over the tonsil, a simple movement with the hand draws the middle (cutting) ring quickly toward the handle, severing the tonsil. 2. The tonsil guillotine proper has a loop within which an oblique-edged knife slides from the handle. Both forms of the instrument are usually provided with an automatic device for piercing the prominent portion of the tonsil and making slight traction on the organ at the moment the section is effected.

It has been used to prevent attacks of epilepsy, angina pectoris, and other spasmodic affections, to cut short the paroxysm of intermittent fever, to mitigate the pain of dysmenorrhœa, and as an antidote to chloroform and chloral. AMYL ALCOHOL, n. Lat., alcohol amylicum [Br. Ph., Belg. Ph.]. Fr., alcool amylique, amylalcool. Ger., Amylalkohol. It., alcool amilico. Sp., alcohol amílico. Syn.: amylic (or pentylic) alco- hol, hydrate (or hydrated oxide) of amyl (or of pentyl), amylate (or pentylate) of hydrogen. A monatomic alcohol consisting of amyl compounded with hydroxyl, $C_5H_{11}.OH = C_5H_{12}O$. Seven isomeric varieties of this formula are known in addition to ordinary a. a., or fermentation a. a., which is a mixture of at least two simple a. a's. The normal a. a's derived from normal amyl, include: (1) Normal primary a. a., pentyl alcohol, butylcarbinol, $CH_3 - CH_2 - CH_2 - CH_2 - CH_2.OH$, a mobile liquid having an odor of fusel-oil, boiling at 137° C., and having a sp. gr. of 0·8296 at 0° C. It occurs in fermentation a. a. and has been prepared synthetically. (2) First (or α) secondary normal a. a., methylpropylcarbinol, $CH_3 - CH.OH - CH_2 - CH_2 - CH_3 = CH_3(C_3H_7)CH.OH$, a thick liquid having the odor of fusel-oil, boiling at 118·5° to 119·5° C. and having a sp. gr. of 0·8293 at 0° C. (3) Second (or β) secondary normal a. a., diethylcarbinol, $CH_3 - CH_2 - CH.OH - CH_2 - CH_3 = (C_2H_5)_2CH.OH$, a liquid of peculiar odor, boiling at 116·5° C., and having a sp. gr. of 0·8315 at 0° C. The isoaa's, derived from isoamyl comprise: (4) First primary isoa'. a., inactive a. a., isopentyl alcohol, isobutylcarbinol, $(CH_3)_2 \equiv CH - CH_2 - CH_2.OH$, a liquid constituting the greater part of fermentation a. a. and except for the absence of any action upon the plane of polarization, having identical physical properties. According to some, this variety was regarded as having lævogyre powers, and others have supposed inactive a. a. to be made up of a mixture of active a. a. (No. 5) and a dextrogyre variety described by Bakhoven. Its derivatives have been termed α-amyl compounds. (5) Second primary isoa' alcohol, active a. a., $\begin{matrix}CH_3\\OH.CH_2\end{matrix}\rangle CH \equiv CH_2 - CH_3$, a liquid boiling in the neighborhood of 128° C. and having an odor resembling that of fusel-oil but of a fruity character. It is believed to occur in fermentation a. a., but has not yet been satisfactorily isolated. It rotates the plane of polarization to the left, but its derivatives (called β-amyl compounds) rotate it to the right. (6) Secondary isoa' alcohol methylisopropylcarbinol $(CH_3)_2 \equiv CH - CH.OH - CH_3$, a liquid of sweetish odor, boiling at 111° to 113° C., and having a sp. gr. of 0·819 at 0° C. (7) Tertiary isoa. a., dimethylethylcarbinol, $(CH_3) \equiv C.OH - CH_2 - CH_3$, a liquid of peculiar aromatic odor, boiling at 102·5° C., and on treatment with a freezing mixture solidifying into white acicular crystals, melting at 12° C. Ordinary a. a., the a. a. of fermentation, fusel-oil, potato-spirit, is produced in the fermentation of starch, and is hence present in the spirit distilled from potatoes. It is a colorless, inflammable liquid, of burning taste and giving off a vapor of penetrating odor, which when inhaled produces coughing, a sense of suffocation, vertigo, and headache. It boils at 131° to 132° C. and freezes at —21° C. Sp. gr. at 0° C., about 0·823 to 0·824. It deviates the plane of polarization to the left, the degree of deviation varying with the specimen examined. In composition it is a variable mixture of the other a. a's, consisting especially of first and second primary isoamyl alcohol with a certain amount of normal primary a. a. Four isomeric bodies of this composition are known: 1. Alpha a. $(CH_3)_2 = CH - CH_2 - CH_2.NH_2$, derived from the amyl of inactive amyl alcohol. 2. Isoamylamine, derived from fermentation amyl. 3. The individuals consist of a sacciform thallus, which at first is unicellular, but by the formation of transverse partitions is subsequently divided into several cells, some of which develop into oogonia and others into antheridia. These organs, whether on the same or on a different thallus, come into contact, the membranes separating them at the point of contact are perforated, and the entire protoplasm of the antheridium passes into that of the oogonium, the result of the union being a globular, thick-walled oospore. The oogonia of the A. differ from those of the Peronosporeæ in presenting no distinct differentiation into periplasm and ovum (oosphere) before impregnation. [B, 54.]

ANEMONANTHEA (Lat.), n. n. pl. A^{2}n(a^{3}n)-e^{2}m-o^{2}n-a^{2}n(a^{3}n)'-the^2-a^3. In De Candolle's classification of plants, a section of the genus Anemone, corresponding to the Euanemone of other authors. [H. Baillon (L, 87).]

ANEMONE (Lat.), n. f. A^{2}n(a^{3}n)-e^{2}m-o'ne(na). [In English, a^{2}n-e^{2}m'o^{2}n-e.] Gen., anemo'nes. Gr., ἀνεμώνη, the A. coronaria [Hippocrates] (from ἄνεμος, wind, because the plants of this genus grow in windy places). Fr., anémone. Ger., Windblume, Windröschen. It., anemone, anemolo. Sp., anemona. A genus of perennial ranunculaceous herbs, of the tribe Anemoneæ, established by Tournefort and Linnæus, bearing apetalous flowers with a calyx composed of 5 to 15 colored sepals, which are deciduous with the stamens, and having both radical and cauline leaves, the latter being opposite or whorled in their arrangement. The genus is divided into three sections, often regarded as distinct genera: 1. Anemanthus, or Euanemone (the A. proper). 2. Hepatica. 3. Pulsatilla. Baillon, furthermore, assigns to this genus the sections Adonis, Knowltonia, and Consiligo. By Bentham and Hooker, and by most other botanists, these sections are put into distinct genera, Knowltonia and Adonis (including the Adonis and the Consiligo of Baillon). In the section Euanemone, to which the genus as originally made by Linnæus was restricted, the involucre is remote from the perianth; in Hepatica, the involucre is calyciform and close to the perianth, which is composed of two whorls with alternate leaflets, those of the internal row often being doubled; in Pulsatilla, the perianth and involucre are like those of Hepatica, but this section differs from both the others in that the exterior stamens are sterile and the carpels are surmounted by a long feathery style which persists after the flower fades. Aprilblume, weisse Osterblume. It., silvia. Wood a. A species, belonging to the section Euanemone, 6 to 9 inches in height, bearing a single white or pale rose-tinted flower, with an involucre of 3 petiolate bracts. The whole plant possesses acrid properties, due probably to the presence of anemonin (q. v.). The leaves and flowers constitute the herba ranunculi albi (seu nemorosi), herba anemones nemorosæ, herba jaceæ nemorensis, and the root is the radix ranunculi albi, radix anemones nemorosæ, etc. Both have been used externally as antiparasitics, counter-irritants, and vesicants; internally in large doses they act as corrosive poisons, producing gastro-intestinal inflammation and ulceration. Cattle feeding upon A. nemorosa are said to have convulsions and bloody urine; hence the term herba sanguinaria applied to the plant. An American species, belonging to the section Pulsatilla, with purplish flowers, regarded by Gray as distinct from A. patens, to which it is often referred. It is one of the species furnishing the drug pulsatilla of the U. S. Ph. [B, 5.] Cf. A. patens.—A. ochotensis [Fisch.]. See A. alba.—A. patens [Linnæus]. Syn.: Pulsatilla patens [Mill.]. A species growing in central and eastern Europe, and in Siberia. It belongs to the section Pulsatilla and closely resembles A. pulsatilla, from which it is chiefly distinguished by the mode of division of its leaves and by its large purplish, reddish, or yellowish-white flower. It resembles A. pulsatilla in properties, and like it furnishes the drug pulsatilla of the U. S. Phar. It has been much employed medicinally in Siberia, where a decoction is employed in infantile convulsions. The fresh herb contains anemonin, and is very irritating and acrid, but drying deprives it of these qualities to a great extent. The A. patens, var. nuttalliana, is the A. nuttalliana of Gray. [A, 260; B, 5, 180.]—A. pavonina [De Candolle]. Ger., Pfauenanemone. A variety of A. hortensis found in France, with large bright-red flowers. [B, 49, 134.] Used like A. hortensis. [L.]—A. pratensis [Linnæus]. Fr., pulsatille noire. Ger., kleine Küchenschelle, Wiesen-Küchenschelle, Beisswurz. Syn.: Pulsatilla pratensis [Mill.]. Meadow-a.: a species, belonging to the section Pulsatilla, growing in central and northern Europe. It is a plant 2 to 6 inches high, having dark-violet flowers with comparatively short revolute sepals and very long stamens. The herb, herba pulsatillæ nigricantis (seu minoris), herba anemones pratensis, pulsatilla [U. S. Ph.], has a slight pungent odor, and a burning acrid taste, which it loses to a great extent upon drying. It contains anemonin, anemonol, and tannin. It is used for the same purposes as A. pulsatilla, and has been particularly recommended in amaurosis and other ocular disorders, in syphilis, and in diseases of the skin. [B, 5, 180.]—A. pulsatilla [Linnæus]. Fr., coquelourde [Fr. Pasque-flower; a species, belonging to the section Pulsatilla, growing in northern Europe. It is a plant, 5 to 8 inches high, with large, solitary, purple flowers, having long, straight sepals and short stamens, and with repeatedly bipinnatisect, almost tripinnatisect, leaves. Its herb is official as pulsatilla (U. S. Ph.), and was formerly known as the herba pulsatillæ vulgaris (seu cæruleæ), herba ventis, herba nolæ culinariæ. The root has also been used medicinally under the names of radix pulsatillæ vulgaris (seu cæruleæ). It is said to be somewhat less acrid than A. pratensis, but contains the same constituents. It is used in acute catarrhal affections of the respiratory, aural, gastro-intestinal, and urinary tracts, particularly in children, and as an emmenagogue and remedy for dysmenorrhœa. Fr., angine de poitrine. Ger., Herzbräune, Stenocardie. It., angina di petto. Sp., angina del pecho. Syn.: angor pectoris [Frank], syncope angens (seu anginosa) [Parry] (seu cardiaca anginosa [Darwin]), asthma arthriticum [Schmidt] (seu spastico-arthriticum inconstans [Stöller], seu dolorificum [Darwin], asthenia pectoralis [Young], cardiogmus [Sauvages], sternodynia syncopalis [Sluis], stenocardia [Brera], pnigophobia [Swediaur]. Breast-pang, dyspnœa of the heart, neuralgia of the heart, diaphragmatic gout; a term applied by Heberden to a disease first described by Rougnon, in 1768. It is characterized by sudden attacks of terrible pain in the region of the heart, often radiating to the shoulders and down the left arm, with intense difficulty in breathing, a feeling of constriction of the chest, an overpowering apprehension of impending death (so that all movements are avoided, lest they should precipitate that event), deadly pallor, cold sweat, and great weakening of the heart's action, while the pulse is diminished in volume. The attack usually lasts only a few seconds or minutes, and then the circulation becomes active, the surface grows warm, and in many cases eructation (occasionally vomiting) occurs, and a quantity of pale, watery urine is passed. Some writers recognize two forms, true and false a. p., the former occurring by far the most frequently in men, and the latter in women. True a. p. is associated with serious disease of the heart (either valvular disease, degeneration of the muscular tissue, or embolism of the coronary arteries), and it is not uncommon for the paroxysm to prove fatal. The false form has been referred to some pathological condition of the nervous apparatus of the heart (hyperæsthesia of the cardiac plexus, according to Romberg) induced by the abuse of tobacco, tea, coffee, etc., or, in a reflex way, by indigestion or uterine disease. In the treatment of the paroxysm, the skin should be stimulated by friction and hot applications. Among the drugs that have proved most efficient are amyl nitrite (2 to 5 drops by inhalation), nitro-glycerin, and morphine (to be used cautiously, the latter hypodermically). [A, 289, 385; D, 1; L, 128, 134; B. Fraenkel (M, 1).]—A. p. reflectoria [Landois]. [D, 35.]—Vaso-motor a. p. Lat., a. p. vaso-motoria. 1. One which is due to irritation of the vaso-motor nerves of the heart, with consequent contraction of the arterioles and obstruction of the circulation in the organ. [D, 35.] 2. A condition in which, together with the usual symptoms of a. p., there are numbness, pain, and difficulty of movement in all the limbs, which became pale and decidedly cyanotic. The pulse remains unaffected and no abnormal sounds are heard over the heart. The attacks are brought on by exposure to cold, and at times placing the hands or feet in cold water is sufficient to induce a paroxysm. The attacks last from a quarter to half an hour, and usually they can be cut short by frictions, hot applications, and hot drinks. According to Landois and Nothnagel, the condition is due to a widely distributed spasm of the blood-vessels. [B. Fraenkel (M, 1).]

ANHYDRIDE, n. A^{2}n-hi'dri^{2}d(drid). From α priv., and ὕδωρ, water. Fr., anhydride. Ger., Anhydrid. It., anidride. Sp., anhidrido. Syn.: acid (or acid-forming) oxide. An oxide derived from an oxy-acid or other oxy-compound (such as an alcohol) by the loss of the elements of one or more molecules of water; e. g., carbonic acid, H_2CO_3, deprived of the elements of a molecule of water, H_2O, becomes carbonic a. (carbon dioxide), CO_2. The a's are often erroneously called anhydrous acids. They have the same relation to acids that anhydrous (secondary) oxides have to hydrates (primary oxides); they represent one or more molecules of water in which the whole of the hydrogen is replaced by one or more negative radicles, while the corresponding acids represent one or more molecules of water in which such radicles replace one half of the hydrogen. The a's are more or less quickly converted into acids by the action of water or of hydrates. They are of three classes: 1. Those deriving from one molecule of water by the replacement of H_2 by two molecules of a monatomic acid radicle. 2. Those deriving from one molecule of water by the replacement of H_2 by one atom of a diatomic acid radicle. 3. Those deriving from three molecules of water by the replacement of H_6 by two molecules of a triatomic acid radicle. [B, 2.] For the particular a's, see under the corresponding acids.—A. of an alcohol. See under Hexatomic ALCOHOL.—A. saligénique (Fr.). Saliretin (the a. of saligenin). The a. of a fatty acid, formed by the deduction of the elements of water from a double molecule of the acid. The removal of one molecule of water produces the first e. a., and that of two molecules the second e. a. Thus, from lactic acid, $C_3H_6O_3$, are formed successively the first e. a., $C_6H_{10}O_6$, and the second e. a., $C_6H_8O_4$. [B, 4.]—First ethereal a. Ger., erstes Esteranhydrid. See under Ethereal a.—Mixed a. Ger., gemischtes Anhydrid. ANIMAL, adj. A²n′i²m-a²l. Lat., animalis. Fr., animal. Ger., thierisch, animalisch. It., animale. Sp., animal. Pertaining to animals, having the nature of an animal, pertaining to the life of an animal. [J.] See A. CHEMISTRY, A. KINGDOM, A. LIFE, A. MAGNETISM, etc.

ANIMAL, n. A²n′i²m-a²l. Gr., ζῷον. Lat., animal. Fr., animal. Ger., Thier. It., animale. Sp., animal. 1. As generally accepted, a living organism endowed with sensation and the power of voluntary motion and characterized by taking its food into an internal cavity (stomach) for digestion. This definition holds good for all but the lowest forms of a's, but to distinguish the latter from plants by any general rule has been found practically impossible. On this account Haeckel has proposed a kingdom, the regnum protisticum, intermediate between the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Thus far, the nearest approach to an absolute distinction between a's and plants lies in the fact (almost if not quite invariable) that no animal organism has the power of converting inorganic into organic matter, but has to draw its food in great part from other organisms. Practically, however, this test can not always be applied, and the question of the animal or vegetable nature of some of the lower organisms can not be positively settled. [C; L.] 2. In a conventional sense, any other a. than man. [L.]—Abranchiate a's. See ABRANCHIATA.—Acalephous a's. An old term for the jelly-fishes and other stinging Radiata. ANTIMONY, n. A^{2}n'ti^2-mo-ni^2. From ἀντί, against, and Fr., moine, a monk, according to the old derivations, but more probably from Ar., al-ithmud or al-uthmud, a collyrium, which is doubtless related to the Gr. στίμμι. Lat., antimonium, stibium. Fr., antimoine. Ger., Antimon, Spiessglanz. It., Sp., antimonio. A metallic element, first isolated in the pure state by the alchemists of the Middle Ages, but known to the ancients under the form of its compounds, especially the trisulphide, to which indeed the name a. (antimonium, stibium, etc.) was formerly applied. A. occurs in nature chiefly as the crude trisulphide (stibnite, antimonium crudum), and, more rarely, as the trioxide or tetroxide, or combined with copper, lead, silver, and nickel, either alone or in conjunction with sulphur. Metallic a. is obtained under two conditions, amorphous and crystalline. Crystalline a., or ordinary a., obtained by the reduction of a. trisulphide or a. trioxide, is a silvery-white, lustrous, hard, brittle substance of sp. gr. 6·7, which when cooled slowly after fusion forms rhombohedral nearly cubical crystals. It melts at 425° to 430° C., and volatilizes at a red heat in air. Amorphous a. (explosive or electrolytic a.), obtained by the electrolysis of an acid solution of a. trichloride, occurs as an amorphous mass having a steel-like lustre and presenting a peculiarly mammillated surface. Sp. gr., 5·78. It contains from 3 to 20 per cent. of a. trichloride. On heating or percussion, this variety is converted, with the evolution of considerable heat, into the crystalline form. A. may also be obtained in the form of a fine black powder (a. black) by precipitating the trichloride with zinc. A. is rarely employed by itself, but its alloys with other metals (tin, lead, copper, and zinc), constituting type-metal, pewter, Britannia metal, etc., are much used, a. imparting to such compounds the property of expanding after fusion, so that when melted and poured into molds they fill every part of the latter in solidifying, and furnish sharp casts. Metallic a. was formerly employed in the preparation of goblets (calices vomitorii), the water contained in which acquired emetic properties, and of pills which, on being swallowed, excited emesis, and, being thrown up, were used again (pilulæ perpetuæ). A. combines directly with hydrogen, the halogens, oxygen, sulphur, and other elements, and with a number of organic radicles. See STIBINE and STIBONIUM. The compounds with oxygen and sulphur have both acid and basic properties, giving rise, on the one hand, to antimonious, antimonic, and thioantimonic acids, and, on the other hand, combining with acids to form the salts of a. In composition, a. acts as a trivalent or a quinquivalent radicle, forming the antimonious and antimonic compounds. It also acts apparently as a quadrivalent radicle, furnishing the antimonoso-antimonic compounds. Atomic weight, 122 [B, 2, 3], 120 [B, 159]; molecular weight, probably 480 (the molecule consisting probably of 4 atoms). Symbol, Sb (from stibium). tassio, tartaro emetico (o stibiato). Sp., tartrato de antimonio y de potasio. Tartrated or tartarized a., tartar emetic, potassio-antimonious tartrate. A double salt of tartaric acid formed by replacing the 2 hydrogen atoms in the acid characteristic by an atom of potassium and a molecule of antimonyl: $2KSb.C_4H_4O_7 + H_2O = 2C_2(OH)_2H_2{<}^{CO-O.SbO}_{CO-O.K} + H_2O$. It forms either rhombic crystals or a white powder moderately soluble in water and in dilute alcohol, insoluble in strong alcohol. On heating to 100° C. it loses its water of crystallization, and on heating to 200° C. it is converted into tartrelic acid. It is used as an antipyretic, diaphoretic, and expectorant in doses of $\frac{1}{32}$ to $\frac{1}{8}$ grain, and as an emetic in doses of $\frac{1}{2}$ grain. In quantities much exceeding this it acts as an irritant poison, producing violent gastro-enteritis, with vomiting and choleraic purging. Locally applied, it causes marked irritation with the production of a pustular eruption resembling that of small-pox. It enters into the composition of the vinum antimonii, unguentum antimonii, and syrupus scillæ compositus. Such a compound, precipitated as a white powder from an acid solution of a. trichloride by the addition of water, is known from the name of its inventor Algarotti, a physician of Verona of the 16th century, as powder of Algaroth (pulvis Algarothi, pulvis angelicus, mercurius vitæ). It varies in composition according to the method of preparation. When made by the addition of 17 parts of water to 10 parts of the trichloride it has the composition of antimonyl chloride, SbOCl, and forms small rhombohedral crystals. Antimonyl chloride is also prepared by heating equal parts of a. trichloride and absolute alcohol in sealed tubes and, as an amorphous powder, by the addition of 3 parts of water to 1 part of a. trichloride. An oxychloride of the composition $Sb_4O_5Cl_2$ is obtained by heating antimonyl chloride or by the addition of 3 parts of hot water or from 5 to 50 parts of cold water to a. trichloride. It occurs in both the amorphous and the crystalline state. Other oxychlorides, containing a lower proportion of chlorine, are formed by the action of larger quantities of water upon a. trichloride. A grayish crystalline substance, of the composition $SbOCl + 7SbCl_3$, is formed by dissolving a. trioxide in boiling a. trichloride, and this in turn, by the addition of absolute alcohol, furnishes the substance, $2SbOCl + Sb_2O_3$. Similar compounds, formed from a. pentachloride by dilution with water, are a white oxychloride of the composition SbO_2Cl, and a. oxytrichloride, $SbOCl_3$, a yellow, deliquescent, crystalline mass. By heating a mixture of a. pentachloride and a. pentoxide to 140° C. two oxychlorides are formed, one, a white, very deliquescent, crystalline mass of the composition Sb_3OCl_{13}, and the other forming yellowish crystals of the composition $Sb_3O_4Cl_7$. Powder of Algaroth was formerly used extensively in medicine, but is now chiefly employed as a source of the pure trioxide of a. and of tartar emetic. APOPLEXY, n. A^{2}p'o-ple^{2}x-i^2. Gr., ἀποπληξία (from ἀποπλήσσειν, to strike down). Lat., apoplexia. Fr., apoplexie. Ger., Apoplexie, Schlagfluss, Hirnschlag, Hirnschlagfluss. It., apoplessia. Sp., apoplejía. Properly, a stroke of paralysis. In typical cases, the individual suddenly loses consciousness and all control over the voluntary muscles. If he does not die at once, he remains for a considerable length of time profoundly unconscious, breathing stertorously, and, besides the total loss of voluntary control over the muscles, it is commonly found that certain muscles, especially those of one side of the body, are completely paralyzed, so that they fail to balance the tonic action of their opponents (see HEMIPLEGIA). This condition may gradually end in more or less complete recovery. The term is also made to cover cases in which the foregoing description applies only in part; thus, the loss of consciousness may be incomplete and transitory, there may be no paralysis, and the phenomena may be gradual in their appearance. As the cause of the symptoms in the typical cases is commonly an escape of blood into the substance of the brain, in consequence of the rupture of a blood-vessel, the use of the term has been extended, in a pathological as opposed to its clinical sense, so as to include various forms of hæmorrhage into and between the tissues.
